There are but two Cabinet ministers in town, the busy Postmaster General and the busier Secretary of the Interior; two Ambassadors, the Mexican and the Turkish, and only a few foreign Ministers and the smaller officials who are obliged to be in Washington during the absence of those higher in authority. This only proves the habit of the Washington official to flee from Washington in July and stay away during August and as long as possible in September. This is not so much because of the weather as it is that officials are more than apt to be men of means and own not only a city home somewhere, but a summer home somewhere else. Washington is not the most comfortable spot in this country, all the summer, except for the absence of smart society, which has the fleeing habit.

The Cabinet members are nearly all with their families in their summer homes. The exceptions are the Secretary of War, who is spending his Fourth in the Sandwich Islands, with his household party, including Mrs. Dickinson and their youngest son; Postmaster General Hitchcock, who has no family, and likewise no summer cottage; Secretary Ballinger, who will leave within a few days for his Seattle home, stopping en route several times on departmental business, and Secretary Wilson, who is in the West, but who does not maintain a home in his State since the death of his wife and the professional debut of his daughter.

The German Ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, sailed yesterday for Europe to join his wife and children, who have been in their German home several months. The Turkish Ambassador is still new in his office, and has not yet gone to a cooler climate. The Mexican Ambassador is preparing to get away in a fortnight.

Mr. Cornillas, who is in Chicago for a few days on business, before going to New London to marry Miss Anna Ewing Cockrell, will probably not be among us again next year, as there are hints of a promotion for him to a European post after his marriage to the distinguished young woman who has been an important factor in both official and "smart" residential society ever since her graduation and the assumption of the duties of hostess for her father, then Senator from Missouri.
